HISTORICAL SKETCH

The Indianapolis Literary Club was organized on 10 January 1877, at the home of John D. Howland, who became the club's first president. The stated purpose of the club is the pursuit of 'social, literary, and aesthetic culture.' Informally, the club has acted as a meeting place for a number of the city's leaders from various professions. Membership lists indicate that the club has continued this function throughout its history and into the present.

A usual meeting consists of the president introducing the speaker, a club member, who presents an original paper on the topic of his choice; then a discussion takes place. The only business handled by the club as a whole is the election of new members (still done with a box of white and black balls) and officers. Most officers change yearly, but secretaries have usually served for decades. The officers hold an annual meeting in June at which most club business is handled.

Over the years, minor changes have occurred. The club now meets on the first and third Monday of the month rather than on every Monday. Membership was originally one hundred; now it is one hundred fifty. Membership is still restricted to men, and is by invitation only, after one 'reading' (formerly three). The club's ranks have always been filled with notable Indianapolis residents; the list has included such names as Albert J. Beveridge, Charles W. Fairbanks, Walter Q. Gresham, Benjamin Harrison, Thomas A. Hendricks, Daniel Wait Howe, Meredith Nicholson, George and Allen Clowes, James Whitcomb Riley, Booth Tarkington, and Lew Wallace.

The club does not undertake any activities beyond the regular meetings and dinners, although its members are involved individually in a number of service organizations. The club has had a small endowment, but is mainly supported by modest yearly dues. Over the years it has met in a number of places, including in the more recent past the D.A.R. chapter house on Pennsylvania Street, the Propylaeum, the 38th Street branch of the Merchants Bank, the Robertson Library at Butler University, and now Park Tudor School. Dating back to the period when it had a room of its own, the club owns about ten paintings by artists of the Indiana School, and two Piranesi engravings. The paintings and engravings are on loan to the Indianapolis Museum of Art and the Columbia Club. The club also owned a number of historical chairs, however, it sold many of them at an auction in 1993.

Until recently, essays by club members were considered the property of the author, and copies were not kept with the records. However, the group is currently working to donate most of the papers to the Indiana Historical Society. Some of the papers were deposited at the Indiana State Library and the Indianapolis Public Library as well.
