HISTORICAL SKETCH

During World War II most families were notified of prisoners-of-war by telegram. About every six months after the original notification of the men's status the families would receive postcards generally describing the men's health as good and their living conditions as at least tolerable.

Conditions for prisoners of war were usually less than tolerable. The barracks the men were housed in became overcrowded after the first few months of war. The men slept two to a bed because of lack of heating and inadequate blankets. An average daily menu would contain: half-cup of coffee, three potatoes, one cup of soup, one slice of bread, and one serving of margarine. Vegetables were issued only when available and within the limits of the quantities available to German citizens.

Treatment of the prisoners at many of the camps was never considered good, and at times was brutal. When prisoners were caught trying to escape they were usually shot. In general, health of the prisoners was good. They maintained their weight until the last month or so before the evacuation; they were active in games and sports, and stayed mentally healthy by keeping busy. The main ailment for prisoners was skin diseases, but improvements were always noticed during the summer months when men could be outside most of the time.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

This collection consists of a TLS from Mr. and Mrs. Claude E. Daily in New Albany, Indiana, to Mr. and Mrs. Cousins in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. It informs them the name Francis Cousins was given as a prisoner of war on a German prisoner of war radio program on 2 April 1945. Also in the collection is the transmittal envelope sent the next day, on 3 April.
