HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

John Tomlinson Brush (1845-1912) was born in Clintonville, New York. He lost both parents by the age of four, and lived with his grandfather in Hopkinton, New York until he was seventeen. He then attended Eastman's Business College in Poughkeepsie, New York. After serving with the 1st New York Artillery during the Civil War, he went to Troy, New York, where he became a member of the Owen, Pixley, and Company. Brush moved to Indianapolis in 1875 where he founded the When Clothing Company. To help promote the city and his business, Brush became involved with Indianapolis' entry in the Western League baseball team in 1885. Two years later, he was the driving force in the city's acquisition of a franchise in the National League. After three uneventful seasons, the team folded, however, Brush maintained his interest in baseball team ownership, and in 1892, he acquired the Cincinnati Red Legs. He sold his interest in the Reds in 1902 and acquired control of the New York Giants, which he owned until his death in 1912. Brush continued to reside and operate his clothing store in Indianapolis despite ownership of baseball teams in other parts of the country. He also was majority owner of the Indianapolis entry in the Western League from 1894-1896 and helped this team win the pennant in 1895 when he "loaned" them several of his Cincinnati players. The National League frowned on this practice and forced Brush to relinquish his control of the Indianapolis team in 1896.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The collection contains information about Brush's death. Included in the collection are newspaper obituaries and elaborate memoriams from the National and American Leagues as well as the New York Giants. There also are later newspaper articles about Brush from the 1920s-1975, and photographs of Brush and his Indianapolis residence. A masonic badge, 23 September 1884, presented to John T. Brush is stored with Artifacts as artifact number R 468.
